

The Metaphysics of the Trinity: New Directions

14th – 16th March 2016

Corpus Christi College, Oxford

Schedule

Monday 14th March

14.00-15:00: Arrival and registration (Tea/coffee)

15.00-16.30: Brian Leftow (Oxford): The Trinity is Unconstitutional

Chair: Martin Pickup

17.00-18.30: John Heil (Washington University, St Louis): Being of One Substance

Chair: Chris Hughes

18.45 onwards: Informal socialising and dinner (location tbc)

Tuesday 15th March

9.30: Tea and coffee

10.00-11.15: Daniel Molto (York): The Mereology of Latin Trinitarianism

Chair: Daniel Kodaj

11.30-13:00: Rob Koons (U. Texas, Austin): Divine Persons as Relational Qua-Objects

Chair: David Glick

13:00-15:00: Sandwich lunch and Tea/coffee provided in college

15:00-16.30: Shieva Kleinschmidt (USC): Simple Trinitarianism

Chair: Anna Marmodoro

16:45-18:00: Mark Makin (Biola): God from God: The Essential Dependence Model of Eternal Generation (Winner of the Metaphysics of Entanglement Essay Prize)

Chair: Martin Pickup

19.00: Conference dinner in hall

Wednesday 16th March

8.30: Tea and coffee

9.00-10.30: Nikk Effingham (Birmingham): Proceeding and Filioque

Chair: George Darby

11.00-12.30 Richard Swinburne (Oxford): Defending the Social Theory of the Trinity

Chair: Daniel Kodaj

12.45: Conference closes

The conference is financially supported by The Metaphysics of Entanglement Project, The Aristotelian Society, The Analysis Trust, The Mind Association, the New College Ludwig Humanities Fund and the Templeton World Charity Foundation.

Abstracts

Nikk Effingham: Proceeding and Filioque

It is standard to believe that one Divine Person proceeds from another e.g. that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. This paper discusses the metaphysics of proceeding, arguing that it is best thought of as a form of metaphysical dependence (rather than, e.g., a causal, temporal, or quasi-temporal procession). Theories whereby metaphysical dependence is symmetrical have been discussed in the recent literature on dependence. That said, I end the paper by discussing the extent to which holding that the Divine People proceed from one another makes for an irenic resolution of the long-standing debate concerning filioque.

John Heil: Being of One Substance

After expressing doubts that a fully satisfactory metaphysical account of the trinity is possible, the paper takes up an ontological picture proposed by Descartes (against a late scholastic background) and developed by Spinoza. The picture includes, in addition to substances, attributes and modes. After a brief excursion into Locke's account of persons, an account of the Trinity in terms of a single substance triply attributed is sketched and defended against one line of objection.

Shieva Kleinschmidt: Simple Trinitarianism

Some trinitarians, such as Thomas Aquinas, wish to claim that God is mereologically simple; that is, God has no parts distinct from Himself. In this paper, I present Simple Trinitarianism, a view that takes God to be simple and incorporates resources used in metaphysical debates about Ontology to produce Trinitarian-friendly results for claims about the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Unlike with Aquinas' view, Simple Trinitarianism does not attempt to find a place for the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in our ontology. Thus, Simple Trinitarians avoid multiplying gods, conflating Persons, and identifying the Persons with minor entities such as modes. The Simple Trinitarian then uses semantics to explain how our ordinary sentences about the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are true.

Rob Koons: Divine Persons as Relational Qua-Objects

Is the Christian doctrine of the Trinity consistent with a very strong version of the thesis of divine simplicity? Yes, so long as the simple divine nature is a relational nature, a nature that could be characterized in terms of such relations as loving, knowing, and executing. This divine nature functions simultaneously as agent, patient, and action: as lover and beloved, knower and known, effector and effected. We can then distinguish three really distinct aspects of the one simple reality: God-qua-lover-simpliciter, God-qua-beloved-simpliciter, and God-qua-lover-cum-beloved, which can be identified with Father, Spirit, and Son, respectively. However, it would be a mistake to suppose that God-qua-lover loves but is not beloved, or that God-qua-beloved is loved but does not love, since it is essential that each of the three Persons both loves and is loved (knows and is known, effects and is effected). Instead, we must attach the qualifications also to the action and not just to the agent or patient. So, the Father (God-qua-lover) loves-qua-lover, and similarly the Spirit loves-qua-beloved. I will draw on Fine's (1982, 1985) theory of qua-objects, on my own account of relational facts, and on recent work on the semantics of as-clauses to elucidate this model more fully.

Brian Leftow: The Trinity is Unconstitutional

A number of recent authors propose to use the metaphysics of material constitution to make sense of the doctrine of the Trinity. I argue that this won't do.

Mark Markin: God from God: The Essential Dependence Model of Eternal Generation
(Winner of the Metaphysics of Entanglement Essay Prize)

According to the doctrine of eternal generation, the Son is eternally begotten of the Father. Although the doctrine is enshrined in the Creed of Nicaea and has been affirmed by Christians for nearly 1700 years, many Protestants have recently rejected the doctrine. Eternal generation, its detractors contend, is both philosophically and theologically suspect. In this paper I propose a model of eternal generation and demonstrate how it avoids these objections. Eternal generation, I argue, can be understood as a form of essential dependence. To say that the Son is begotten of the Father is just to say that the Son essentially depends on the Father. The essence of the Son involves the Father, but not vice versa.

Richard Swinburne: Defending the Social Theory of the Trinity

In previous publications I have defended a social theory of the Trinity in terms of three divine 'persons', the Son and Spirit being produced by the Father necessarily in virtue of his perfect goodness. These 'persons' have individual consciousness. I give my a priori argument for the truth of this version of the social theory. I then defend it against objections. In particular I defend it against William Hasker's two objections - that this theory assumes more than one divine essence, and it assumes that the Father 'creates' the other two. I deny that it has these implications; and I give reason to suppose that 'Latin' theory of the Trinity is incoherent.
